Economic Development in Latin America and the Methodenstreit: Lessons from History of Thought

Natália Bracarense

Abstract: Latin America has experimented with two development strategies over the last two centuries. The first is "outward-oriented" development based on exports of primary commodities, while the second relies on domestic industrialization from within. A consensus that both models failed to achieve sustainable development in Latin America opened space for rethinking development theory and policy at the beginning of twenty-first century. Nevertheless, the debate lacks the understanding that history is non-linear, which explains why peripheral countries are emulating core countries to promote development. This paper argues that the recurrent inadequacy of development theory is due in part to the dichotomy between history and economics that emerged with the Methodenstreit – a debate about what method was most adequate to undertake social analyses. Development theory presupposes historical specificity, its raison d'être being the belief that underdeveloped economies function differently than their developed counterparts. A meaningful theory of development relies on a shift from abstractions based on human nature to historically grounded principles.

Development economics confronts the fact that there is poverty, illiteracy, inequality, and violence in the world. The search for ways by which countries might transcend these circumstances has engendered diverse doctrines and great controversy. Concerns of national development are, of course, closely related with the problems first broached by the classical political economists. Nevertheless, development economics became a matter of international interest only in the 1950s (Dalles 1956, 124-125), becoming established as a sub-discipline at the beginning of the Cold War era.

The author extends her sincere gratitude to those who helped make this a better work, and she is especially thankful for the excellent criticism made by Professor John Henry, Andy R. Johnson, and Professor Martha Campbell.
