exterminated or to arrest sealers until heavy losses forced the Canadians to accept hunting restrictions. Fur seals born on American soil, he argued, were American property, even if they spent two-thirds of their lives at sea, and were entitled to the same protection as American citizens. More and more American opinion swung to this viewpoint. Congress reviewed the problem in 1888-89, and, after bitter argument over Bering Sea sovereignty, rushed through an innocuously worded bill the last night of Cleveland's term, ordering a presidential proclamation to restrain hunting in the Bering Sea within the "domain of the United States." The vague phrase increased British suspicion, already roused by the false rumor that President Cleveland had unlawfully signed the bill in the early hours of Inaugural Sunday.

"Domain" was defined only when the cutters Rush and Bear began to board schooners in the Bering Sea, seizing sealskins, hunting gear, sometimes the salt, and ordering the vessels to Sitka. Naturally captains disobeyed but, without gear, could not hunt and had to sail home. Canadians celebrated the first arrivals' courageous defiance before realizing the new tactic effectively stopped sealing without troublesome litigation and expense. Actually an expedient adopted by captains too short-handed to spare officers for convoy duty, it frightened the sealers more than outright seizures. Angry Canadians at public meetings called for war against the aggressor, castigated Lord Salisbury, and demanded England seek arbitration to prove their right to kill seals at sea. Hastily Sir Julian Pauncefote asked the new Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, to invite discussions. Welcoming negotiation, Blaine declined to ~~initiate~~ initiate talks. He asked for an immediate suspension of sealing before another summer's
